

John Williams*Tactical Training

It was mainly lectures. You did get these odd cases where the enemy done so and so and you had to say on a map reference where would you attack, where would you put your section and that sort of thing. But in the main they were really lessons based on things which had occurred. And no doubt they were taking into account the old story that an infantryman is an infantryman. And as somebody told us on one occasion "No matter what sort of weapons you have and had, that hill isn't won until there's at least one platoon on the top of it", which I thought was quite a good philosophy. You can have all the weapons in the world you like but if the enemy is on the hill and you're here you can't win it. But that hill is won when you're on the hill and the enemy aren't.
